PRESENTS

Legal Update & Best Practices for Jails/Corrections

Public Agency Training Council

DATE:

November 28, 2012

Description:

This training will review holdings and standards that apply to jails, focusing on those that are peculiar to the main jail population: pretrial detainees.

A jail is a special community with very specific outer boundaries. The interior components of a jail also resemble a community. To run effectively, jails require a high degree of uniformity. The jail environment, by its very nature, may contribute to the filing of litigation.

Inmates usually seek monetary damages. Money damages are awarded against the individual officials who have been shown to be responsible for violating constitutional rights. Corrections staff, therefore, must be concerned, individually, about the impact of civil rights lawsuits that may be bought against them.

The leading rule for corrections workers is to follow agency policy. Other rules are: to get good training in all aspects of the job; to become familiar with laws (statutory and court rulings) that directly affect the job; to identify and follow a good mentor; and to keep good records of work performed and of any unusual incidents.
